

Texas Family Law: What to Tell Your Kids About Divorce, 3rd of 5 Installments

By: David Wynne

<http://www.ftworthfamilylawattorney.com/>

The children are innocent

We're the Wynne Law Firm. For more than 16 years we have served the parents and families of Fort Worth. Nothing can make it any easier to tell your children that mom and dad are divorcing. However, there are some things you can explain to them that make understanding the impact this change will have on their world a little less traumatic. This is the second of five installments on what to tell your kids about divorce.

Your family is still here

Kids grow attached to their family. With their mom and dad splitting up they have a right to continuity in their lives. They need to know that their brothers and sisters, cousins, aunts, uncles, their grandparents and most importantly, their parents, will still be there. There will still be family holidays and outings, birthdays and Sunday dinners. Tell them that mom and dad are just divorcing—only mom and dad and not the entire family. Let them know that they will still see all of their family members.

Aggressive, controlled representation

The Wynne Law Firm works hard to see that our clients are treated fairly under the law. Our practice of family law often requires a degree of rigorous representation, but one that is always under control. If you have a matter concerning divorce and children, call us at 817-339-6916. Or complete our contact card in the Contact section of this Website. Tomorrow's installment continues with what to tell your kids about divorce.